SOME STATE CANDIDATES

A Few Words About the Men Who Will Fill the Various State Offices.

There is campaign literature of many kinds. There is defamation of candidates on the opposite side, and where there is not mud throwing, there is dust kicking for the purpose of blinding the voters to the real issues before them.

These shall be a series of articles dealing with the republican candidates on the state ticket. It shall be attempted to place before the readers of this paper a clear and definite understanding of their respective personalities, capabilities and qualifications for the offices sought. It will be left to others to expound platforms and orate upon governmental policies. To others will be left the business of attacking the motives and patriotism of the democrats—if, indeed, they are to be attacked at all.

Service to the State

It can be seen at a glance by men who have resided in Nevada for any length of time, that the nominees on the republican ticket this year, form a group, notable for their genuine service to the state of Nevada. They are willing that the voters of the state take their measure with the tape line of service to the state. They invite judgment as to their sincerity by past performance, both public and private. As to future conduct, if elected to office, they are willing that past performance be the guaranty of their patriotism and zeal in future service.

These men are of established reputation in this state. Individually, they are examples of the best citizenship in the communities in which they reside. They are leading spirits in local and state affairs.

George S. Nixon

The keynote of the characteristics that mark the personality of each candidate on the republican ticket, is particularly dominant in the make-up of George S. Nixon, candidate for re-election to the office of United States senator. For example, he has taken a leading part in any and every line of private business he has undertaken in Nevada. He has been in the second class in nothing; first class in everything. He is a tireless worker, with judgment seemingly unerring, and therefore a leader in whatever he attempts to do.

He is the premier state builder in Nevada. He has no superior in the extent of his loyalty to the interests of the people of his state. A scrutiny of his acts as a member of the senate will show his public life as well as his private business life, is shaping itself to accord with his one article of faith—the progress and upbuilding of Nevada. An enthusiastic worker in the republican ranks, he is not offensively partisan. He looks at all questions, public and private, with the dispassionate appraisal of the business eye. He has never resorted to the trick of the demagogue nor to slander an adversary to gain an end. He never needs to cover his trail.

His Opponents

Opposed to him we find Key Pittman, a well known lawyer, but an unknown quantity as to his ability to be of service to the people of this state in the United States senate. He is untried and unproved. He has no record to which the people of Nevada may look for knowledge of what he can or will do for the state.

The socialist candidate, Jud Harris, is a man of ability and integrity, but not widely known in Nevada. His party showed good judgment in his selection, and while he will poll a large vote, the people of the state cannot be expected to put aside a well tried and capable public servant and all-round man of affairs for a newcomer.

Tasker L. Oddie

Tasker L. Oddie's career is one of the fascinating stories of Nevada. He is one of the strongest characters on any ticket this year. He has been a worker first and a worker last. He has just commenced to work. He is in his prime. Neither success nor adversity has diminished his faith in Nevada. At all times and in all places in this state where he has labored, half his effort was for the public or community good. He holds to these ideals now. He has two hopes for the upbuilding of this state, where he has one for the restoration of his private fortune. He has two thoughts for the progress of the state as a whole, where he thinks once of his own advancement. He will exalt the office of chief executive of this state into an instrument to restore confidence in Nevada's chief industry and promote generally the development of the state's resources.

The republican nominee for Nevada's representative in the lower house at Washington, is E. E. Roberts, a man who has made his impress upon vital affairs affecting his community. He is an educator of advanced ideas. As prosecuting attorney in one of the most important counties in Nevada, he has shown himself fitted to occupy a place where he will represent the people of the whole state over a much wider range of duties. He has been a very busy man and it will be hard to find any part of his work that has not had its direct bearing on the advancement of the interests of Nevada people. He was foremost in disentangling the chaotic banking conditions following the panic.

Frank H. Norcross, at present chief justice of the supreme court of Nevada, and a candidate on the republican ticket for re-election, is a Nevadan in every fiber. He has taken a permanent place among the foremost jurists of the nation. His career on the bench and his usefulness in the field of jurisprudence have just begun. Opposing parties have paid a tribute to his learning and judicial insight by placing no one upon their tickets against him.

W. W. BOOTH

W. W. Booth, the militant editor from Tonopah, and practical printer, is the candidate for state printer. He is unaffiliated with either false pretense or false modesty. He carries the union label and pays better than the union scale of wages. He is competent for the job and indulges in nothing but straightforward talk in presenting his claims upon the voters of the state. He is every man's friend and when he gives his friendship, he gives it for keeps. He was the first in Tonopah and is a never-quitter.

So on through the campaign, these letters will go more into detail of the lives and work of the candidates already mentioned and others to follow. If you are acquainted with these men, you will know them worthy of the stewardship which will be entrusted to them by a majority of the voters of the state this fall.

George Springmeyer

George Springmeyer, the young man with the galvanic temperament and remarkable industry, is but at the beginning of a career, which, if the truth were known, has been dedicated to Nevada. He already has a reputation as a skilled advocate, and in legal learning is at par with his elders. He has crowded vast work into a short period of time. His usefulness to the republican party will come from his uncompromising spirit and his unalterable determination. He is immune to criticism and fire proof against misrepresentation.

William McMillan

William McMillan, the next state treasurer, looks the part of custodian of strong boxes filled with gold. Once before, the people of Nevada elected him governor, but the counters of the ballots made him 22 votes short of the necessary number. He mined on the Comstock in his younger days and knows all the mysteries of the famous Order of Hot Water Boys. He is for economy and efficiency in state affairs, and to have one good square look at him is to be assured that the coin of the realm will be safe in his hands, even without a bondsman.

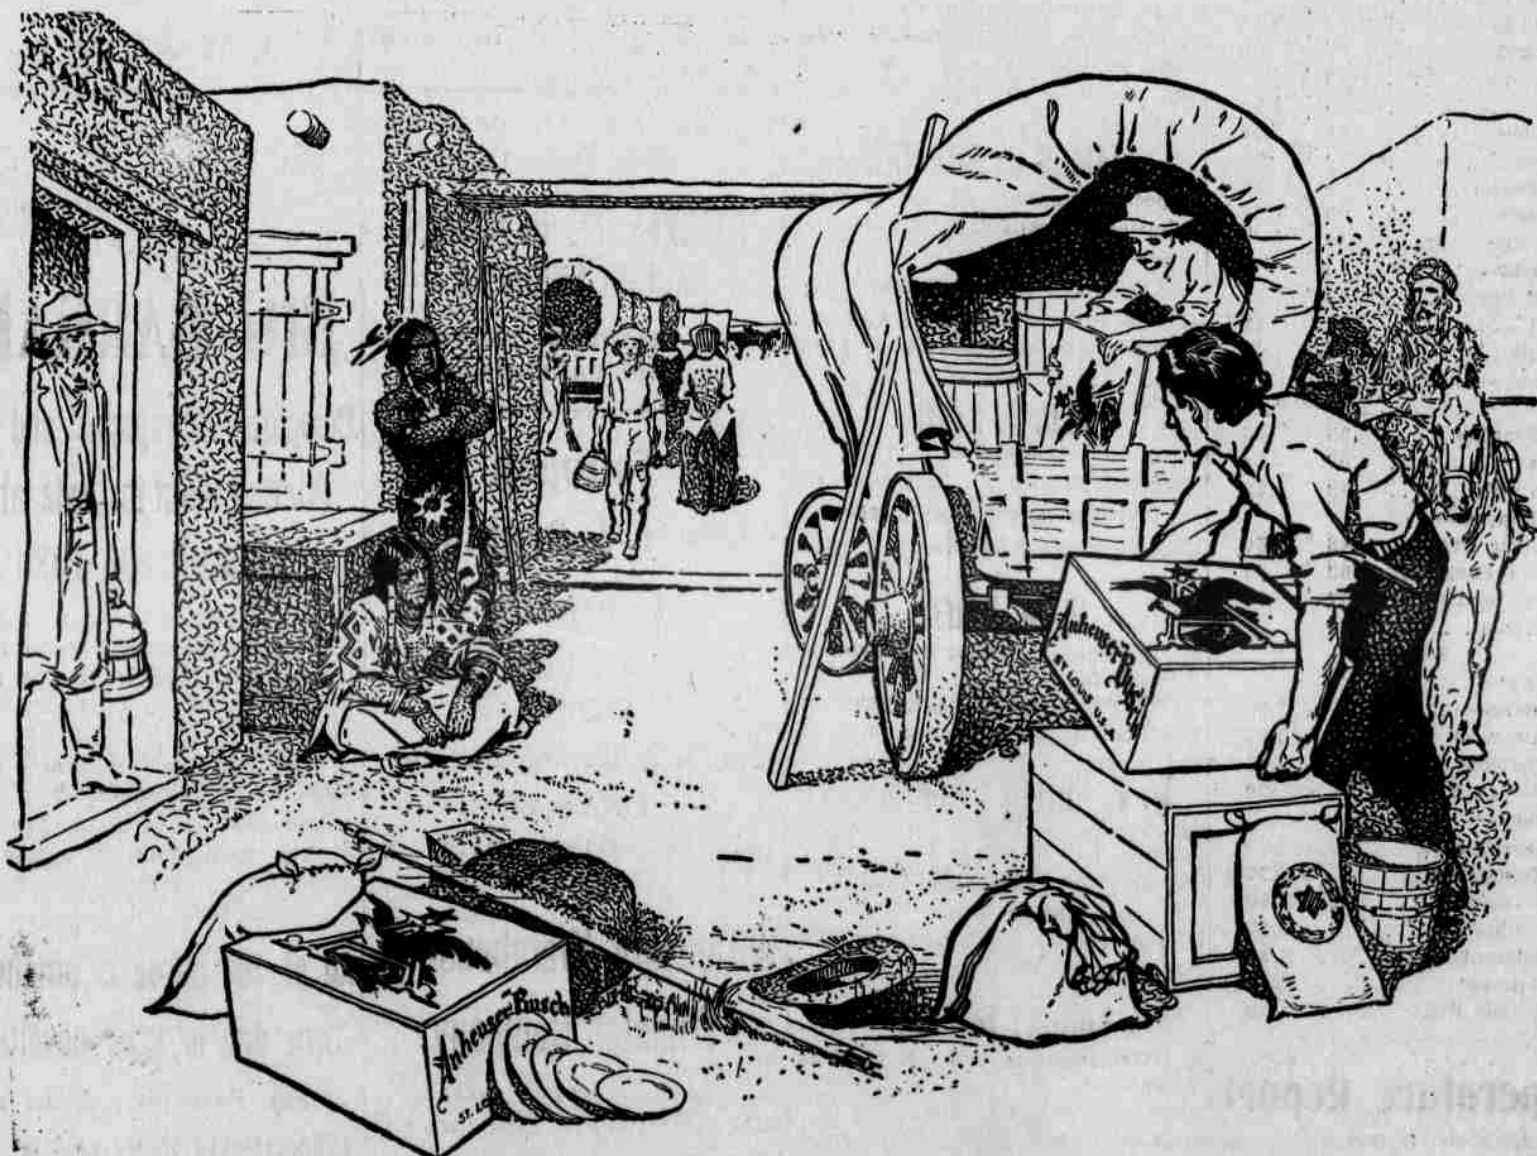

W. G. Douglass

W. G. Douglass, for secretary of state, has a past service to show what may be expected of him in the future. He came to Nevada from Illinois at the age of 20, and has been prominent in politics since 1898. For some time, with the late Orvis Ring, he was the only republican in the state who could be elected to office. He has accomplished much in original lines of reclamation in his county and his example and practice may be followed with profit in many sections, both to the state and to individuals of enterprise.

Charles E. Watson

Charles E. Watson, republican nominee for the office of mine inspector, has a finished education as a mining engineer, both in the technical schools and in the school of experience. For twenty years he has been the active superintendent of mining properties, principally within this state. He has been uniformly successful. A survey of his record
